Chapter One

The Harbour at Marseille

The ship came in on the evening tide, her sails the colour of old parchment against a sky already turning to brass. On the quay a boy of perhaps twelve watched her the way other boys watch fireworks — with his whole body, and without blinking.

“She is late,” said the harbour-master, though no one had asked him. “Three days late. Three.” He said it as if the number itself were an insult, and spat neatly into the water.

Edmond had heard the rumours: a storm off Elba, a captain buried at sea, a letter that must never reach Paris. He believed none of them, and all of them — and he ran.
